Allianz Park Stuttgart

Climate-sensitive office architecture and new working environments in the south of Stuttgart

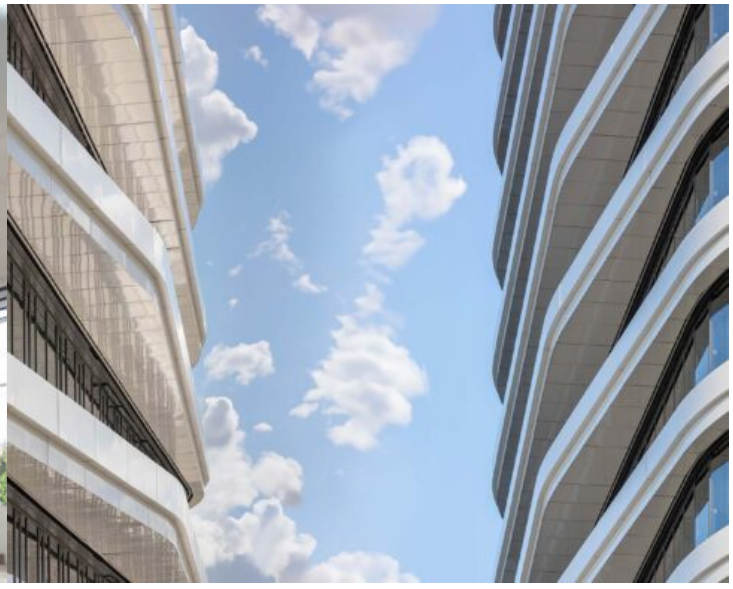

The new Allianz Park Stuttgart in the south of Baden-Württemberg's state capital is a prime example of climate-sensitive contemporary office architecture. An office campus has been created for one of the world's largest insurers, Allianz, which combines a climate-friendly design approach with newly conceived working environments. The anchor point is an almost 100-year-old oak tree that marks the central main entrance, the plaza. In combination with a 17-storey solitary building visible from afar, several organically shaped, lower solitary buildings are grouped in the permeable landscape space. This open plaza situation integrates Allianz Park into the natural urban space.

A design that combines urban climate, utilisation and aesthetics

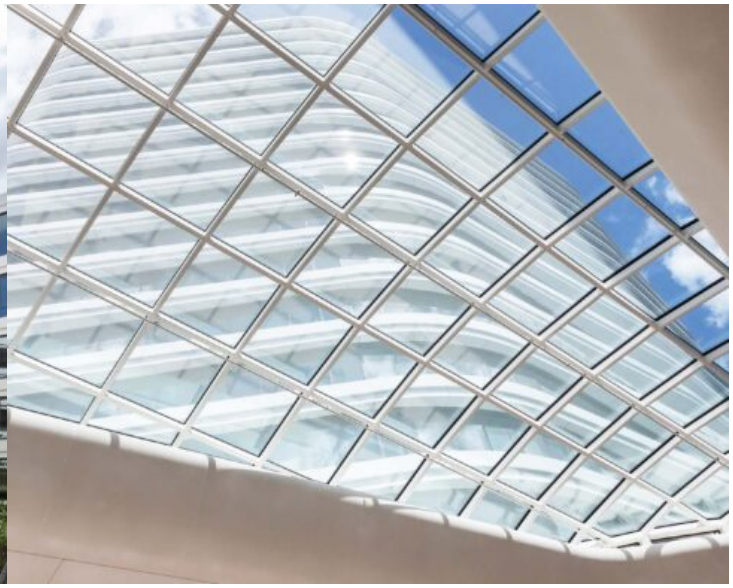

The buildings, which are connected to each other on the ground and first floors, blend into their surroundings like natural components. With their rounded floor plans, they form an architectural unit and at the same time an organic network. The characteristic horizontal balustrades of the glass façade maintain unimpeded air circulation and thus secure the fresh air corridor on the previously undeveloped former sports and green area, which is important for Stuttgart's urban climate. The conceptual centrepiece is the plaza, a light-flooded reception hall spanned by a large glass vault. It serves to provide access to the individual utilisation areas as well as for events. The view through the glass dome glides to the individual buildings, making it easy to orientate oneself within the Allianz Park from the plaza. The lower solitary buildings have green inner courtyards that continue the greenery of the surrounding area within the campus. The so-called Sky Lounge, an event area with an all-round view of Stuttgart and the surrounding area, is located on the 16th floor.
